A) A silver coin, equal to two asses and a half, the fourth part of a denarius (æulis, in our money, three cents and nine mills). 1) Prop.: s. duodeni, Cic. Frequently with numus, Cic. In the genit. plur., sestertium (more rarely, sestertiorum, Col.); sestertium numum, Cic.; also with the symbol HS., ap. Cic. From the frequent use of the genitive form sestertium with numerals above a thousand, it happened that very early 'although not before Augustus

tus) this genitive sestertium was mistaken for a nominative neuter, and so they not only formed the plural sestertia, but declined even sestertium as a noun singular. Hence it came that sestertium (with the omission of mille) denotes a sum of a thousand sesterces (equal to thirty-nine dollars of our money); and with the multiplicative adverbs decies, centies, &c. (omitting centena millia), it indicates a sum of a hundred thousand sesterces; consequently decies sestertium = a million, centies sestertium = ten millions of sesterces; sexcenta sestertia = 600,000 sesterces, Cic.; millies sestertium = 100 millions, Id. 2) Meton.: numo sestertio or sestertio numo, a small sum, a trifle, Cic. — B) Under the emperors also a copper coin of the value of four asses, Plin. — II. sestertium, ii, n. V.

V, v, originally written with the sign of the vowel u, but considered even by the ancients as essentially different from that vowel: on account of this relationship v was frequently changed into u; e. g. solvo, solum; silva, silva. As an intermediate sound between two vowels v was in many cases suppressed; e. g. amasti for amavisti. In ancient manuscripts we find also a purely orthographical omission of the v; e. g. serus for servus, &c. As an abbreviation, V. signifies vir, vivus, &c.; V. C. or VC., vir clarissimus; VCP., voto compositus; V. V., virgo Vestalis. As the sign of a numeral (5), V does not properly belong to this, inasmuch as it is the sign of the open hand (with allusion to the five fingers).
